We extract the following from an sociable paper of the early dates of the Chicago Tribune:

"At a little after eight o'clock on Monday a woman named Broussard, wife of a Mr. Broussard of this city, was shot while on her way to Mass. She was shot by a man named J. H. Broussard, a known drunkard. The man attacked her from behind, and she fell to the floor. She was immediately taken to the hospital and died shortly afterward. The man was arrested and charged with murder."

"The result of my observation enables me to say that the man is thoroughly guilty of the crime charged. He was seen by several witnesses, and, according to their testimony, he acted very promptly and decisively in the matter."
